

Three marks. One of them goes on the letterhead.

Each direction below is built from the palette and the two typefaces the website already uses, so whichever one is chosen, the printed documents and the site will read as the same company. Every one is shown on an A4 sheet at true proportion, on a business card at 85 × 55 mm, and held small — because that is where logos fail.

JPG A JPG cannot have a transparent background. It is not a setting that was missed — the format has no alpha channel, so every JPEG is a solid rectangle of pixels. What is usually sold as a “transparent JPG” is a PNG with the wrong extension.

So each direction ships as two files. The PNG has genuinely no background — that is the one for the letterhead, for Word, for a photograph. The JPG is the same logo on white; on a white page you cannot tell them apart, and it works in the few systems that still refuse PNG. Both are 4000 px wide, which is 338 mm at 300 dpi.

Pick a letter and the rest follows.

All three are already built and sitting in brand/ — 32 SVG masters, 32 transparent PNGs and 24 JPGs. Nothing is waiting on production; the only thing waiting is the decision.

- 01 Name a letter. A, B or C. If two of them appeal for different jobs, say so — a wordmark for documents and a roundel for everything else is a normal way to run an identity, and A pairs with either.
- 02 The other two get deleted, so nobody ever picks the wrong mark off a shared drive by accident.
- 03 The site follows. The chosen mark replaces the placeholder favicon, goes into the navigation bar and the footer, and replaces the typographic letterhead at the top of all sixteen spec sheets.
- 04 Then the descriptor. Right now it reads FOODSTUFF & BEVERAGES TRADING, taken from the registered name. If the cards and letterhead should say something else, that is a one-line change.
